McCall's magazine's "Reader of the Year" Dr. Catherine Andersen relaxes with husband Lloyd and daughters Julia, 10, and Anna, 4, in the den of their newly refurbished home.

Catherine Andersen of SPS wins McCall's 'Reader of the Year' contest

"We made one reader's dream come true!" an article in this month's issue of McCall's magazine proclaims. The article is about none other than Gallaudet's Dr. Catherine Andersen, interim assistant dean of the School of Preparatory Studies, who was selected as the magazine's "Reader of the Year."

In choosing Andersen, who is also chairwoman of Communication and Developmental Studies at SPS, McCall's was impressed with "her enthusiasm and her ever-positive attitude as well as the warmth, friendliness and family pride that shone through the words of her very special [entry] letter."

The "dream" brought the Andersens a 1990 Chevrolet Lumina Euro Sedan, a totally redecorated home, a new wardrobe, and a "new look" for Andersen by McCall's beauticians.

Andersen said she decided to enter the contest two years ago after learning that an old acquaintance from her hometown of Huntington, N.Y., had won McCall's Reader of the Year. "I thought, 'Gosh, real people win this thing.' My husband said, 'You're crazy. You have a better chance of getting struck by lightning.'"

Student workers boycott intramurals

Gallaudet's intramural fall sports program is at a near standstill due to a boycott by its student workers, who are protesting what they say are a number of shortcomings in the program that they want the University to remedy.

The intramural program, a longstanding tradition at Gallaudet, is a division of the Department of Physical Education and typically involves 200 student participants each year.

But on Oct. 2, when the six student workers who make up the intramural staff began their boycott, all but one of its activities, tennis, was halted, according to Dr. David Martin, dean of the School of Education and Human Services, who, with Dean of Student Affairs Dr. Howard Busby, met with the staff Oct. 6. Tennis continues because it is coached by a faculty member, Martin said.

The students' concerns are in four areas, Martin said: that a full-time director be hired (presently, a part-time director, Olivia Schnoor, an employee in the Department of Grounds Services, oversees the intramural program); that more equipment be provided in two areas—sports activities and office operations; and that the floor in Hughes gymnasium, where many of the intramural activities take place, undergo extensive repairs.

Martin estimated that meeting the concerns would cost $25,000, not counting repairs to the gym floor. He said that no cost estimates have been made for the floor repairs.

The intramural program has operated on an annual budget of about $40,000, with one fourth of the funding coming from Physical Education's department budget and the remainder generated by participants' activity fees.

Martin called the meeting with the students "very constructive." He said that the students have been encouraged to come up with long- and short-term proposals to raise funds for the program. He said that the students are seeking a meeting with the Central Administration.

New management programs offered

Gallaudet's Management Institute, the professional development and business training arm of the School of Management, is offering a number of new professional development programs, short courses, and seminars this semester.

The Management Institute is now entering its second year. "Today we are seeing more and more deaf professionals, in unprecedented numbers, who have entered or stand poised for entry into management ranks," said Nancy Bloch, director of the Management Institute. She said the institute was the place where deaf professionals "can nurture, support, and take pride in the successes of others like themselves."

Recent panel discussions have focused on making it to the top and options for management development. Another panel on Dec. 6, "A Conversation with the Voice of Experience: Do Leaders Set the Trends or Follow Them?" will be led by Dr. William Marshall and is open to the public.

A series of weekly management seminars offered this fall are targeted to deaf professionals on the rise. Topics include managing change, organizational politics, black/minority managers, self-affirmation, and diversity in the workplace. Space for these seminars is limited, and early registration is encouraged.

Other Management Institute programs include a small business seminar on "Guerrilla Marketing Strategies" to be held Oct. 21 and microcomputer short courses on dBase III Plus, Word-Star Professional, and MS-DOS, also offered on Oct. 21.

The fall 1989 catalog is available for interested people. For information or to request the catalog, call the Management Institute at x5900.

telling them about herself, her profession, her family, and her beliefs.

A few weeks later she got a message at work that McCall's had telephoned her. Excited, she called back, only to find out that they had contacted her about renewing her subscription. But she did find out later that she had been a contest finalist.

Encouraged, she tried again last December, and in January she received a call from two of the magazine's editors who wanted to interview Andersen and her family at their home the next day. "We didn't know what they were looking for, so we just decided to be ourselves. We dressed casually, and the kids showed them their cat and their goldfish and played songs for them on the piano."

A week later she learned that she had won. "I felt that it really wasn't happening to me. I had to pinch myself."

Then came the hectic part: decorators and designers dropping in, calls from furniture stores and beauticians. Life got more disruptive in the summer when the carpenters arrived, and Andersen came home on a number of occasions to disconcerting surprises.

"One day I found a hole in the wall where a window was to go in. Another time, there was plaster dust everywhere.

"One day the stove and refrigerator had disappeared. We didn't have a washer or dryer for three weeks. It was hard to maintain life in the midst of all this craziness."

The hardest part of the whole experience, she said, "was getting rid of our old things." The Andersens rented a large truck, filled it with their possessions, and drove to Connecticut and New York, where they gave the possessions to their families.

Now that the excitement has died down, has the experience changed the Andersens' lives?

"Well, we feel as if when we go places, people look at us like they know us," Andersen said, "and we keep getting calls from people we haven't seen for a long time who may have picked up a copy [of McCall's]."

"But I realize that these worldly goods don't change you as a person—we still are who we are. If you weren't happy to begin with, these things aren't going to make you happy. But if you are, they sure make things a lot easier!"

Relay service available here

Deaf faculty and staff members at Gallaudet can now make and receive telephone calls anywhere in the country through the Government Services Administration's Federal Telecommunications Relay Service that began last March.

The service can be used for any business-related calls, according to Director of Business Services Chuck Mann, who contacted GSA about allowing Gallaudet to participate in the system.

Mann explained that Gallaudet has been able to take advantage of federal programs, such as life and health insurance, because of its special status that allows the University to be treated as a federal agency.

The relay service is available between 8 a.m. and 7 p.m. Monday through Friday. To place a call, employees can call 708-9300 on TDD, tell the GSA operator that they are Gallaudet employees, and give their business telephone number and the name and number of the person they are calling. Employees can also give business associates the relay telephone number and their office number.

For questions about the relay service, call Cindy Jorgensen, x5777.

This year President King Jordan will be serving as an honorary member of the Secretary of Veteran's Affairs committee. Coordinators and keyworkers will be contacting employees so they can make contributions.
